Eleven-year-old Bryan Zhang launches a nonprofit to help young patients at Lucile Packard Children's Hospital at Stanford.

Four years ago, when Bryan Zhang was 7 years old, he was admitted to Lucile Packard Children's Hospital (LPCH) with pneumonia. During a brief stay, his compassionate nurses brought Zhang a teddy bear to comfort him. He loved the bear and started feeling better. Upon returning home, Zhang kept his new bear friend nearby and started thinking about the other sick children at LPCH and wondered whether they were also lucky enough to receive bears or other gifts to make them feel better.

The youngster traveled often with his parents and usually received souvenir gifts as remembrances of the countries he visited. Zhang decided he wanted to donate the souvenirs to LPCH instead of keeping them for himself. He sent a letter of thanks to LPCH for helping him to get well and for the bear he received. He also shared his new idea to donate souvenir gifts from international travels to the sick children at the hospital.

When the LPCH campaign helped parents help their child reach the next level by starting a nonprofit, Children's Hospital at Stanford (CHS) 501(c)(3) nonprofit was created to support the Hospital with the primary goal of educating and comforting sick children.

Since WTCF's launch in 2013, Zhang has been a regular fundraiser at the hospital. On February 2, a nonprofit was created to help the School in San Francisco. Zhang donated to the hospital and gave gifts of cash and appreciated gifts to the children. More and more children and volunteers are joining WTCF to

A New Kind of Eye Lift

Dr. Carolyn Chang has created a new kind of "eye lift" — it's not surgical and it's organic. It's a product she's developed with Juice Beauty, a company with a prominent reputation as having the highest USDA organic standards in the beauty industry.

Worried about the safety and quality of the medical-grade products she was prescribing to her patients that caused irritation and allergies, especially around the delicate eye area, Dr. Chang researched the field and discovered that there were no truly organic medical products available. Aware that she needed a product that she could confidently recommend, she reached out to Marin-based skin-care company Juice Beauty, knowing that they would be committed to using the most pure and natural formulations.

The result of the collaboration between Juice Beauty and Dr. Chang is the Instant Eye Lift, an organic product that soothes and smooths the skin around the eyes, decreasing puffiness and swelling without chemicals. Unlike eyelid surgery, where excess skin is removed, by applying the Instant Eye Lift eye mask, the eye area becomes firmer and instantly smoothed—reviving and perking up puffy, tired-looking eyes.

"I believe that great skin care is an essential element to any anti-aging regimen and a vital adjunct to the success of every facial procedure," relates Dr. Chang. "Because the skin is sensitive after surgery, particularly around the eyes, I noticed that many patients were experiencing irritation to the medical-grade creams I was prescribing, so I needed more sensitive products with high efficacy. The Instant Eye Lift soothes and reduces puffiness and swelling without irritation. My patients are particular, and they come to me because they want natural results and high aesthetic standards. I expect the same with products I put on their faces." www.juicebeauty.com
